Commuter plane crashes during storm

Associated Press

GOSELAWN, Ind. — An American Eagle commuter plane crashed Monday in a cornfield in northwest Indiana during a driving rainstorm, killing all 68 people aboard.

Flight 4184 from Indianapolis to Chicago went down 30 miles south of Gary at about 4 p.m., the Federal Aviation Administration said.

The heavy rain forced authorities to quickly call off the search of the area until Tuesday.

American Eagle would not speculate on the possibility because of the crash, airline spokeswoman Debbie Mathers said. State police said there were no survivors, according to the FAA.

Debris was so scattered, you really couldn't tell if there was an airplane out there," said Michael Schwanke, a reporter with WLFI radio in Rensselaer who was at the site.

"People around the area were telling me that there was just nothing left," he said.

The plane was descending from an altitude of 10,000 feet to 8,000 feet when it disappeared from radar screens at Chicago's O'Hare Airport, said Don Zochert with the FAA.

The plane had been circling in a holding pattern before it began its descent, said Tim Smith, a spokesman for American Eagle.

People on the scene said there was driving rain at the time of the crash and that it was too dark to see much in the area. Winds were gusting up to 49 mph in Gary, Ind., the closest reporting station, the National Weather Service said.

Bob Stone, a hunter, said he heard the plane's engines just before the crash.

"I could hear a motor winding out and it sounded like thunder and then there was a crash and I didn't hear anything else," Stone said.

Kathy Philpot, a spokeswoman for the Lake County coroner's office, said workers were told to call off the search for bodies and return Tuesday.

Jasper County Sheriff Steve Reames said the Newton County sheriff's department had set up a command post near the crash site.

"We've had torrential rains all day, and right now there's such a downpour. They're almost unable to go out — we're talking open farm country," Reames said.

Media probes LDS Church policies

By GAYLON GARBETT and SUSAN BAGLEY
Universe Staff Writers

Increased interest in religion in America, compounded with elements of recent disciplinary action by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, has created a dynamic mix that attracts the media, say local and national media professionals.

Local and national interest in the disciplinary action policy of the LDS Church was most recently piqued by publicity surrounding Provo resident Lance Allred, who this summer published an article titled "Toward a Common Theology of Mother God" in the magazine, An Independent Journal of Mormon Thought. In the article, Allred asserts that God is both the Father and the Son, and Heavenly Father is the Holy Ghost and acts as an equal partner to Heavenly Father.

Allred met with LDS Church leaders in a disciplinary council Oct. 12 and was given terms of probation by her bishop Oct. 23.

Margaret Toscano, Allred's sister and co-president of Mormon Alliance — a non-profit organization formed "to combat spiritual abuse and defamation of the LDS Church" — said people are interested in this type of case because it deals with basic freedoms and how private organizations handle them.

"I think the case is very newsworthy," Toscano said. "These are First Amendment rights."

DeAnn Evans, assistant professor of communications at the University of Utah and former managing editor of the Deseret News, said the extended coverage of the Allred case in the Utah area may be a result of three main factors.

These factors include the local prominence of the LDS Church, the conflict involved in cases like Allred's, and a nationwide push for increased coverage of religious issues.

"Both nationally and here (in Utah) religion has tended to be under-covered until the last few years, and there has been a movement nationally to cover religious institutions as vigorously as they cover other institutions," Evans said.

Paul Richards, editor of the Daily Herald, said an increased interest in religion in the world is one reason news media organizations are pursuing stories such as the Allred case. He said the Daily Herald's coverage of the case was "straightforward."

"It was nothing different than a normal news story," he said.

Marine biology professor to speak at Forum today

By RAYMOND ROBINSON
Universe Staff Writer

Deep-sea creatures will fill the screen of the Marriott Center scoreboard today at a University Forum.

BYU biology professor Lee F. Braithwaite will present a forum, titled "Emotions of Deep Sea Discovery: Science, Art, and Technology Meet."

The video presentation includes slides and video footage of life in the Bahamas, Braithwaite said. Braithwaite took pictures from a one-man submersible equipped with a 35-millimeter camera.

The slides and video were taken from depths of one-half mile deep, and show deep-sea animals feeding, defensive strategies of prey and strategies of predators.

Braithwaite, a specialist of marine, biology and biological oceanography, has conducted research at the Friday Harbor Laboratories of the University of Washington; the Naval Arctic Research Laboratory at Pt. Barrow, Alaska; the Hopkins Marine Station of Stanford University and at the Harbor Branch Oceanographic Institution at Ft. Pierce, Fla.

Braithwaite received training in marine biology at Stanford University, the University of the Pacific and the University of Hawaii.

He studied marine paleoecology and paleontology at BYU.

During his career, Braithwaite has developed the creation of detailed stipple-ink illustrations and underwater photography of marine life.

The forum will not be broadcast because of copyright restrictions. Following the forum there will be a question-and-answer session in the Varsity Theater.

Duran charged with 4 felony counts for attack on White House

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The man accused of firing a semi-automatic rifle at the White House was charged with four felonies and ordered to undergo a psychiatric exam Monday. Prosecutors said a letter taken from his truck "raises questions whether he is competent."

U.S. Magistrate Deborah Robinson refused to release the handwritten letter, which was taken from Francisco Martin Duran's pickup. She ordered him returned to court Wednesday, after the exam, for a competency hearing.

U.S. Attorney Eric H. Holder Jr. said authorities have a second letter that Duran, 26, was carrying when he was seized outside the White House.

Also found in the truck, according to prosecutors, was a shotgun, an arsenal of ammunition, a gun magazine, a machete, sleeping bags and a stuffed animal.

Officials have previously indicated the letter in the truck was an explanation of how Duran's possessions were to be distributed to his wife and son in the event of his death.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John Finnegan told the magistrate that Duran's letter "brings into question whether the defendant is competent to proceed."

Holder said later the request for the 24-hour psychiatric evaluation was "not an indication that we believe he is incompetent." Nor was it, he said, an indication that prosecutors thought Duran "was at the time of the offense insane."

Competency at this stage means the defendant can understand the charges against him and can assist his attorney, public defender Leigh Kenny.

Kenny said she had no concerns about Duran's competence at this time.

If Duran is found competent after Wednesday's hearing, there will be a preliminary hearing in which prosecutors would have to present enough evidence to justify continuing the case.

He was charged with possession of a firearm as a convicted felon, destruction of federal property, assault on a federal officer and use of a firearm during the commission of a crime of violence. Prosecutors said he could receive as many as 35 years in prison if convicted on all four counts.

Holder said other charges might be filed later.

Prosecutors would not discuss a possible motive for Saturday's shooting, in which a man fired 20 to 30 shots at the White House through the iron fence on Pennsylvania Avenue with a Chinese-made semi-automatic rifle. Eight shots hit the building.

Treasury Secretary Lloyd Bentsen said options officials are considering for increasing security to include closing parts of Pennsylvania Avenue and stationing more guards on the White House sidewalk.

Court papers said Duran pleaded guilty on March 21, 1991, to felony assault while in the Army. He was sentenced to five years at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and in February 1993 was dishonorably discharged.

Holder said prosecutors would argue at the preliminary hearing that Duran should be held without bail.

Duran telephoned his family after disappearing Sept. 30 and said he was never coming back and might be dead soon, according to Joe Gordon, agent in charge of the Colorado Springs office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Food services have few options for excess food

By BETH SMART
Universe Staff Writer

Spencer W. Kimball's warning to students against the dangers of wasted food is familiar to Deseret Tower residents who frequent the Morris Center.

"While millions in the world hunger, other millions eat too much and otherwise waste food," reads a sign hanging over the cafeteria's food tray return.

As excess food goes uneaten on campus, questions arise as to whether BYU Food Services could better utilize the uneaten food.

Confronted with legal restrictions and licensing problems, Food Services administrators say they are conscious of the situation and are doing the best they can under the circumstances.

According to administrators, BYU's policy of serving food a maximum of two times is safe and results in little wasted food.

Stephen Nyman, assistant director of Residence Halls explained that, according to the University's current policies, food is served until it's "inedible." Food is usually reserved once in a different form or as part of the buffet, Nyman said, and "very very little" food is thrown away.

Potential law suits preclude the possibility of giving food away to charities. We don't know what happens to food once it leaves our place," said Sam Brooks, director of BYU Dining Services. Because the University can't monitor the food once it's given away, carelessness could result in food poisoning or contamination. In this case, the University would ultimately be responsible for the mishandling of food.

"It is safe on the part of the University to do whatever they can to avoid possible legal liabilities," said Law Professor Ray Jay Davis.

While BYU hesitates to donate food to charities, such contributions are the only source of food for some charities, according to the Food and Shelter Coalition.

"It's a shame to throw away so much food," said one Food Services employee who asked to remain anonymous. "It might not be a whole lot in comparison to what they serve, but the volume is still substantial."

In addition, food that is thrown away is rarely inedible, the employee said.

Several employees suggested that they be allowed to take excess food home. Other solutions included cooking frozen food as needed to avoid making food that would eventually be thrown away, and better organization of storage areas. Another suggested solution was preparing less food on heavy sack lunch days when, instead of eating at the Morris or Cannon centers, students take sack lunches in the morning for meals on campus later in the day.

"They really try hard (to conserve food) and they do a good job most of the time," said another employee who requested anonymity. "In comparison to how much food we make, we throw away little."

MUSIC BOYCOTT: Trent Reznor is a member of the group Nine Inch Nails. The group is being unofficially boycotted following a Utah performance that many fans considered objectionable.

Utah Nine Inch Nails fans 'boycott' group after concert

By BRYAN WURSTEN
Universe Staff Writer

An "unofficial boycott" of the industrial rock band Nine Inch Nails may be underway in Utah after a concert held two weeks ago offended many of the group's fans, a local music store owner said.

More than 30 Nine Inch Nails compact discs have been returned to Sonic Garden CD Exchange in the last two weeks, owner Terry Xanthos said.

Other local used music stores report a similar rash of CD returns.

"You could call it an unofficial boycott," Xanthos said. "It's an unofficial disapproval of what happened that night," he said.

Xanthos was referring to the Book of Mormon being torn up on stage by the lead singer of a group that was pulled at the last minute from the lineup of the Nine Inch Nails concert Oct. 18, the following day.

The group, Marilyn Manson, was pulled because officials felt its music, stage show and merchandise did not fit in with community standards.

Marilyn Manson sings about teenage suicide and child molestation, Xanthos said.

Xanthos was backstage at the concert and said he wanted to "tackle Marilyn when he started ripping up the Book of Mormon."

Tearing up a Book of Mormon was in bad taste and some people were very offended, said David Whitehead, owner of GrayWhale CD exchange.

Aristide tries to rebuild Haiti amidst confusion

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — He came home to a mess after three years in exile. The National Palace was trashed, the parliament fractured, the reluctant caretaker prime minister impatient to leave for vacation.

With this, President Jean-Bertrand Aristide was supposed to build democracy. More than two weeks after Aristide's return, confusion still reigns behind palace walls.

"You cannot expect it to be workable just in 24 hours," government spokesman Jacques Gourgue said Monday. "That's not possible. No way. No way."

"You have to realize that everything has been totally disorganized and it will take a couple of weeks before things can run smoothly."

When Aristide and his contingent arrived at the National Palace on Oct. 15, they found chaos.

"The palace had been ransacked," said Gourgue. "There were no computers, almost no phone lines working, almost no furniture. I think there was only one computer working. Very few typewriters. What a mess!"

Haiti has no acting prime minister, and the 13 Cabinet ministries are also in flux.

Murder suspect may be obsessed with movie

SALT LAKE CITY — Police throughout the West were looking Monday for a 17-year-old double-murder suspect detectives were told is obsessed with the movie "Natural Born Killers."

Police say Nathan K. Martinez, wanted in the shooting deaths of his stepmother and his half-sister, had shaved his head and taken to wearing tinted glasses reminiscent of those worn by the movie's murderous protagonist played by Woody Harrelson.

The controversial Oliver Stone movie is about two homicidal lovers who go on a cross-country thrill-killing spree.

"There seems to be a preoccupation with the suspect and the movie," said Salt Lake County Sheriff's Detective Jim Potter.

Martinez has been charged with two counts of aggravated murder in the deaths of his stepmother, Lauren Martinez, 42, and his 10-year-old half-sister, Alexis Martinez. Their bodies were found Sunday afternoon in their beds in their home in Bluffdale, a suburb 15 miles southwest of Salt Lake City.

Investigators said they believed Martinez was driving his stepmother's car and that he was armed with .22-caliber handgun, a .22-caliber rifle and a sawed-off shotgun.

He has indicated to witnesses that police would not be able to arrest him alive. Salt Lake County Sheriff Aaron Kennard said at a news conference Monday afternoon, "We are considering him armed, desperate and dangerous."

Investigators found the bodies Sunday afternoon after receiving a tip from police in Logan, 90 miles north of Salt Lake, after a friend of Martinez went to police there after trying to cash a forged check.

The youth told Logan officers that Nathan Martinez told him he had committed the homicides and had asked him to cash the check, which was drawn on the dead woman's account.

Clinton stumps for Democratic candidates

WASHINGTON — Fresh from the pomp and ceremony of his Mideast trip, President Clinton is returning to the nitty-gritty of domestic politics, embarking on a feverish campaign for Democratic candidates in need of a midterm election lift.

Clinton was traveling today to Philadelphia and Pittsburgh to attend rallies for Sen. Harris Wofford and gubernatorial candidate Mark Singel, both in tough races in a state Clinton carried two years ago.

Although many Democratic candidates are keeping their distance from Clinton, a growing number welcome his support now that the latest round of polls shows his numbers are on the rise. He planned to visit at least nine states in the eight days before Nov. 8 midterm elections.

"The wind is at the backs of Democratic candidates now," Vice President Al Gore said Sunday on ABC-TV.

Clinton was no doubt helped by a series of foreign policy successes, including occupying Iraq, standing up to Iraq's Saddam Hussein and last week's Middle East trip where he witnessed the historic Israel-Jordan peace treaty.

Two national polls released over the weekend showed Clinton's approval rating had risen modestly. But many polls are still showing that voters favor Republican candidates over Democrats.

Utah County required to use oxygenated fuel

By CANDACE PERRY
Universe Staff Writer

Beginning today, oxygenated fuel must be used by Utah County residents for the next four months in an attempt to trim down air pollution in the valley.

State and Utah County officials devised a nine-point plan as an alternative to oxyfuels.

Oxyfuels are suspected to create particulate matter, also known as PM10, which can create breathing problems.

State and county officials asked the Environmental Protection Agency to give them time to do a study in the month of January. Officials wanted to determine whether oxyfuels actually reduce carbon monoxide levels and verify if they contribute to PM10 pollution.

The EPA has implemented the use of oxyfuels for Utah County, beginning Nov. 1, in order to reach compliance under the Clean Air Act.

"We requested a waiver from the EPA, but we haven't officially heard back yet," said Andy Hale, environmental scientist for the State Division of Air Quality.

The EPA has instructed Utah county residents that they must use oxyfuels because carbon monoxide, the primary pollutant in the valley, exceeded the federal standards twice last year.

Studies have shown that carbon monoxide decreases with use of oxyfuels, but PM10, Utah County's second highest pollutant, is suspected to increase.

The EPA's primary concern is reducing the dominant pollutant, carbon monoxide. No published studies have proven that oxyfuels create PM10, said Bill Baranowski, transportation engineer for Mountainland Association of Government.

Critics claim that nitrogen oxide, a gas which can combine with other air pollutants to form particulates (PM10), is generated when fuel-gasoline is mixed with grain alcohol or other oxygen-boosting substances to make it burn cleaner.

Instead of oxyfuels, the nine-point plan wants to strictly enforce current emissions testing standards, use remote sensing (an infrared monitor on the highways) and better train mechanics on how to improve repairs on polluting cars.

Residents' complaints to the county have increased with the use of oxyfuels, as many have automobile problems not experienced previously, said Baranowski. Officials also feel pollution is increased by oxyfuel use.

Carbon monoxide levels did not exceed federal standards in Salt Lake, Davis, and Weber counties. As in previous years, oxyfuels were waived for those areas.

New mall means relocation to trailer park residents

By KRISTIN KEMMERLE
Universe Staff Writer

After hearing comments from residents who are upset about being relocated, the Provo City Council voted Tuesday to allow Mayor George Stewart to proceed with negotiations to acquire the Laurelwood trailer park property for the proposed Provo regional mall.

Stewart is negotiating to purchase 19 acres of property, located at 210 W. 1500 South — the site of Laurelwood trailer park. Provo needs to find 100 acres for the proposed fashion mall.

Residents of Laurelwood trailer park are not happy they must move once the city purchases the land.

At the Provo City council meeting, Laurelwood residents Barbara Julius and Christopher Lee asked City Council members to vote against any ordinance that wouldn't fairly compensate Laurelwood residents for having to move.

"There is no way Provo can compensate for my loss unless it relocates me to another trailer park in Provo," Julius said, who has paid off her mobile home and is debt-free.

Julius said she doesn't want to buy a home and pay off a 40-year mortgage at her age.

"Some of us live alone," Julius said. "We don't want to start over."

Although Laurelwood is the only trailer park in Provo, "Our plans are not to have another trailer park in Provo," Stewart said.

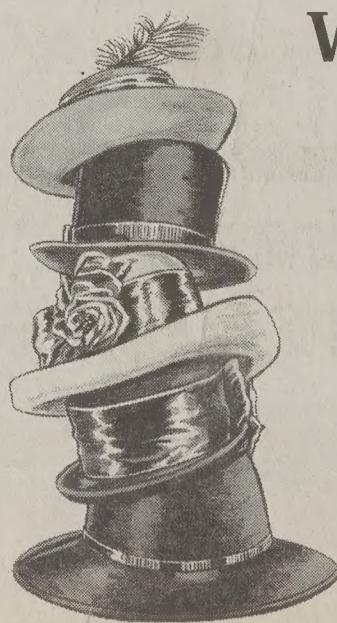

Once Laurelwood tenants sign an agreement to relocate, they have one year to find new housing.

Stewart and council members said they would not make any special concessions for Laurelwood tenants and would follow state relocation laws.

The mayor and council members said they are committed to the mall because of its economic value. Provo would collect approximately $5 million in annual sales revenues, about 60 percent of the current sales tax total collected by Provo, Stewart said.

Regardless of the mall's economic boon to Provo, its creation leaves Laurelwood residents unhappy.

Labor unions break vow, open wallets to Democrats

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Labor unions that vowed to punish Democrats who voted for the North American Free Trade Agreement have decided instead to swallow their pride and open their wallets.

In all, a dozen unions that angrily threatened to withhold cash this election season have given more than $800,000 through their political action committees to Democrats who voted for the trade agreement, according to spending records filed with the Federal Election Commission.

The unions that were the most critical of the agreement have been more selective, choosing mostly to give donations to pro-NAFTA Democrats in tight races, the records show.

As campaigns heated up in September, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers PAC distributed $194,150 to candidates. Only $33,200, or 17 percent, of that total went to Democrats who voted for NAFTA. But two-thirds of their pro-NAFTA donations, or $22,000, went to Democrats who are in trouble.

One such recipient was freshman Rep. Karen Shepherd of Utah, who is in a ferocious battle against a millionaire Republican. The IBEW, which feared jobs would flow to Mexico if NAFTA was passed, gave $2,500 to Shepherd in September.

Shepherd has also received the maximum $10,000 donation from the Steelworkers, United Food and Commercial Workers, and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

The IBEW's September contribution pushed its election-cycle total to $9,500. Meanwhile, the Teamsters, whose president, Ron Carey, angrily declared, "we won't forget what happened here" after the NAFTA vote, has given Shepherd $5,000.

"Karen sees it as a priority to mend those fences, and she has," said Paul Svendsen, a spokesman for Shepherd's campaign. "We met with memberships, with union leaders to talk about NAFTA, and the way to put it is that we agreed to disagree on this one."

In the end, labor leaders said, it came down to a choice between keeping a year-old threat or assisting dozens of longtime allies in political peril.

The stakes — keeping Democrats in control of Congress — were too high in the end.

"The labor folks themselves are coming to a practical, logical conclusion that these are the people who are far more likely to help them than the Republicans running against them," said Don Sweitzer, political director for the Democratic National Committee.

"It is necessitating them holding their noses and supporting some folks who didn't support their position on NAFTA," he said.

Recreation opportunities essential for recovering accident victims

By JULIE ROSE
Universe Staff Writer

People injured in accidents often spend weeks in rehabilitation but end up wondering what types of recreational activities they will be able to participate in with a disability.

Opportunities for recreation are an important aspect of the recovery process for patients with disabilities, said Ron Liston, administrative director of rehabilitation services at Utah Valley Regional Medical Center.

Two weeks ago, a young head injury patient left the hospital after 40 days in intensive care and one month in rehabilitation. His mother commented to Liston about the importance of rehabilitation in the recovery process, "The doctors and nurses on the acute side of the hospital gave him his life. You've given him his future."

Liston believes programs such as the National Ability Center in Park City, which offers recreation activities to disabled individuals, help give injured people a future.

"If they've lost their mountain biking or their tennis, it's important that they find something to fill what was taken from them," Liston said. "In many cases, they can still do recreation activities, and that's where the need for recreation programs lies."

The National Ability Center provides recreation activities to anyone with mental or physical disabilities, said Debra Hart, marketing director. The center offers lessons in snow and water skiing, horseback riding, swimming, tennis and basketball, depending on the season.

"Our participants range from car accident victims to the learning disabled," Hart said. "We don't focus on a particular disability and the people we work with are anywhere from three to 75 years old."

Last year the National Ability Center provided over 4,500 lessons in various activities to disabled individuals for a minimal fee, Hart said. The center is a non-profit organization and generates money from special fund raising events, grants from private corporations and foundations, and private donations.

"We are dedicated to the development of lifetime skills for persons with disabilities and their families by providing affordable, quality sports and recreational experiences," said Hart.

Hart said the center focuses on recreation and sports as a form of rehabilitation.

"A lot of times someone in a traumatic accident will go through rehabilitation and therapy and then go home," Hart said. "We want them to be involved in our programs so they can be active and don't have to sit at home."

A major focus of the National Ability Center is to include the entire family of the disabled individual in the recreation activities.

"The participants and their families both benefit from our programs," said Brook Schaefermeyer, program coordinator. "The individuals learn new skills that will influence their lives in a variety of ways. The families learn skills that help them integrate the disabled individual into the family."

Alpine skiing is the biggest program offered by the National Ability Center, Schaefermeyer said. All of the lessons are taught by certified instructors who maintain a professional standard of quality.

"Volunteers are a big part of our program," Schaefermeyer said.

"Most of them volunteer for something they enjoy doing, but it is important that they have a working knowledge of disabilities and sports."

"If they've lost their mountain biking or their tennis, it's important that they find something to fill what was taken from them. In many cases, they can still do recreation activities."

for the rest of the NBA that is a scary thought.

Terry Cummings returns to the Spurs for his 12th season in the NBA. He has lost a step, but he still has the wide body and the potential to put up big numbers. Joining Cummings at big forward is J.R. Reid, the former lottery pick out of North Carolina. Reid has never realized his potential in the NBA, but he still has time on his side.

The small forward slot is now occupied once again by Sean Elliott, obtained back from the Detroit Pistons for first round draft pick Bill Curley. Elliot has had an excellent pre season, and seems to be benefitting from the three-point line being moved in. Elliot will be relied on to pick up the scoring slack from Robinson.

Also hoping to cash in on the shorter three-point line is former disgruntled Minnesota Timberwolf Chuck Person. The Spurs are also hoping Person can find that outside stroke that made him so dangerous with the Pacers.

The void that the Spurs are looking to fill the most this season is the lack of production from their guards. Avery Johnson is adequate and has a lot of guts, being the player with the longest streak of games played by an undrafted player, but he doesn't have a jump shot. It is shocking that Vinny Del Negro is still in the league after four seasons, but he finds a way to produce and survive. However, survival skills are not going to produce championships.

The key for the season will be the play of Willie Anderson.

If Hill can sell his system and himself to the Spur players, expect them to once again appear as a sleeper challenger for the NBA title. If Hill does not sell himself, make sure to tune in to the nightly episode of "As the Worm Turns," and don't be surprised at the end of the season if "Mr. Robinson" wants to pack up his bags and move to another neighborhood.

Jazz's Sloan unsure about future in Utah

Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — Jerry Sloan, the NBA's third-winningest coach over the past five seasons, says not even he knows if he will still be running the Utah Jazz after this season.

The 52-year-old former Chicago Bulls All-Star is entering the final nine months of his contract with the beginning of the 1994-95 season this Friday when the Jazz host Miami.

He has been with Utah since 1984, taking over early in the 1988-89 season when Frank Layden stepped down. But ownership has been mum about the future of Sloan, the only coach other than Chicago's Phil Jackson and the Knicks' Pat Riley to have taken his team to conference finals two of the past three years.

"I'll work until they tell me not to," Sloan said. "I've never asked about (contracts). I have no control over those things. I feel no pressure."

Indeed, Sloan's last contract — a year's extension through this season — was delivered by Jazz owner Larry H. Miller in October 1992.

Since then, Sloan, who reportedly makes $500,000 a year, had his worst season in Utah (47-35 in 1992-93) and one of his best when the Jazz ended 53-29 last season and went on to the Western Conference Finals, losing to eventual NBA champion Houston.

While Miller was not immediately available for comment, Sloan — who is behind only Jackson (295) and Riley (288) for wins in the past five seasons — has the support of both Layden and players.

"Jerry Sloan is the most underrated coach in the league. He's the Jazz intangible we don't talk about enough," said Layden, now team president. "Any discussion of the Jazz should start with, 'We've got a great coach.'"

All-Star forward Karl Malone agrees, and observes that Sloan has grown more relaxed and confident in recent years.

"I've never seen (Sloan), in the nine years I've known him, to be this laid-back, this relaxed," Malone said. "He still pulls in the reins when he has to, but he has changed a lot to better this team."

Fight for No. 1 creating 'bullies'

Associated Press

The quality of college football's mercy is about to be tested.

With the same teams listed in different order atop the two polls and no chance of settling the who's-really-No. 1 debate on the field, the temptation is there for heavyweights Nebraska and Penn State to make their arguments by beating the daylights out of sparring partners.

Here's hoping they don't. Not much good, and even less of a reward, figures to come from that sort of thing.

That was a lesson that should have been learned this past Saturday. In a scene that could easily be repeated in any of its final four games of the season, Penn State slapped Ohio State with its most humiliating defeat in 40-some years. A few more games like that one and college football figures to be the biggest loser.

When coach Joe Paterno was asked at midweek whether he would consider running up the score to impress poll voters, Penn State's guiding light sounded insulted and said he'd be happy to win by just one. Yet, even after winding up with the decidedly short end of the stick in a 63-14 rout, Ohio State coach John Cooper thought Paterno had been true to his word.

"I thought Joe was pretty generous to us. In fact, I thanked him after the game. He played a lot of different people. We were playing against some third-team defensive players."

If this is what Penn State — under orders to hold it down — accomplished against the nation's No. 21-ranked team, they are the best team not just of this season, but maybe this century. If the reason for the score was anything less noble — say currying favor with the voters — get used to hearing these kind of testimonials.

The remainder of Paterno's schedule reads Indiana and Illinois on the road.

Northwestern and Michigan State at home. Penn State might need just 63 points — total — to get through all four games and still have enough left over for whichever Pac-10 impostor it gets to pound in the Rose Bowl.

The Cornhuskers' road to the end of the regular season isn't much tougher — home against Kansas, then Iowa State and Oklahoma on the road. Their best chance to put legitimate distance between themselves and Penn State could come in the Orange Bowl, where they could face a credible threat in Miami. They need to resist the temptation to needlessly stomp somebody sooner.

It's pick-'em right now. Nebraska has five more first-place votes and six more total points in The Associated Press media poll. Penn State has two more first-place votes and two more total points in the USA Today-CNN coaches' poll. Neither coach has tried to sway any votes with his powers of persuasion. For the moment, anyway.

"The way I look at it, you play the season out," Paterno said. "If we do that and win the rest of our games and

I feel we're No. 1, I'll say it then. "Until then," he added, "I'll let the guys say it."

Osborne was similarly nonchalant. "I don't much care about the pressure about them in the sense that may dictate in which bowls you play. All we want to do is play well. We care about them in the sense that we deserve to be there. If not," he added, "then we've done all we can."

We will take both of them at our words. While their teams have separated themselves from the pack, there is nothing other than style to separate them from the rest of the world.

The real problems will come in the team, seeing a big score posted by other, tries to up the ante by throwing touchdown bombs in the last seconds of what is already a guaranteed victory.

After all, there's only so many you can knock someone down and apologize, as Ohio State did, for doing it to your fist. When it happens more than once, you get labeled a bully.

And nobody, poll voters included, likes a bully.

I Can't.

{ I don't know how to get off. }

UNIVERSITY

FORUM ASSEMBLY

Tuesday, November 1, 11 A.M., Marriott Center

LEE F. BRAITHWAITE

Professor, Department of Biology

"Emotions of Deep-Sea Discovery: Where Science, Art, and Technology Meet"

(Lecture illustrated with color videotape. This forum will not be rebroadcast.)

Early deep-sea biologic discovery, though very exciting, was limited to gropings in the dark with cumbersome nets and dredges. Animals brought to the surface were preserved, classified, anatomically described, and often illustrated in beautiful color. Hypotheses of processes were numerous, but proofs of their worth were long in coming.

With technology brought forth in the last two decades, oceanographers are now able to enter the depths with both manned and unmanned submersibles to the greatest of ocean depths. Finally, hypotheses, instead of taking many decades to prove, can be accepted as fact or discarded almost immediately. With the advent of submersibles, oceanographers can videotape the behavior of the fascinating creatures of the black deep where living light (bioluminescent) displays are stunningly beautiful and quickness and speed are surprising.

Dr. Lee Braithwaite is a specialist of marine biology and biological oceanography. He received training in marine biology at Stanford, the University of the Pacific, and the University of Hawaii. He also obtained background in marine paleoecology and paleontology at Brigham Young University. He has conducted research at the Friday Harbor Laboratories of the University of Washington; at the Naval Arctic Research Laboratory at Pt. Barrow, Alaska; at the Hopkins Marine Station of Stanford University; and at the Harbor Branch Oceanographic Institution at Ft. Pierce, Florida.

Throughout his career Dr. Braithwaite has also fine-tuned the creation of detailed, stipple-ink illustrations and underwater photography of marine life.

[There will be a question-and-answer session following the forum at noon in the ELWC Varsity Theater.]

Most college students try to recycle, protect environment, survey says

By CANDACE PERRY
Universe Staff Writer

The condition of the environment is worse than it was five years ago, according to 62 percent of college students surveyed last week.

Twenty thousand of the nation's college students from 42 states and eight countries attended a college festival, a national marketing event held in Provo.

Over two days, nine computer terminals were set up for the survey, and about 100 students participated.

Students had to continuously wait online to take it," said Tara Kenzie, senior executive for the firm's public relations.

It was overwhelming the number of students really wanted to participate."

Overall, 82 percent of the students attending the conference revealed that they make personal efforts to recycle on campus.

Efforts by students are being made to improve the future of the environment — 70 percent of the students said they look for products with packaging which are safe for the environment, and 58 percent said they are willing to pay more for those products.

Of the students who said they would pay more, three-fourths said they are willing to spend a premium of at least 6 percent.

College campuses are also doing their part for the environment, according to students.

More than half said their colleges or universities are environmentally conscious, as demonstrated by their on-campus recycling programs, environmental courses and student organizations.

Despite this, 71 percent of the respondents would like even more environmental activities to be offered on their school's campus.

When asked what issues seemed to be the most pressing environmental problems, 15 percent of the students said endangered plants and animals, 13 percent said population and 12 percent said loss of rain forests.

"The results of this survey are consistent with the experiences we've encountered on over 500 college campuses we work with annually," said Nick Keller, director of the National Wildlife Federation's Campus Outreach Division.

"The challenge is to convert the positive energy and efforts of today's college students into results that positively impact the future of our environment."

Republican mayors endorse Democrats

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Prominent Republicans are rejecting their own candidates in remarkable fashion this year, exposing fault lines within the party and helping GOP campaigns in some states.

Republicans stand to make substantial electoral gains Tuesday. Some prominent party members are engaged in a fight that could amount to political fratricide in several states.

The latest Republican defector is Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan, who endorsed Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein over the weekend. New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani led the way last week with his dramatic verbal endorsement of Democratic Gov. Mario Cuomo.

Some Democratic candidates are aggressively promoting independence from President Clinton. That type of distancing is more routine in a midterm election year than in high-profile defections plaguing the GOP.

Some crossover are drawing charges of treason from inflexible Republicans and appear to be helping create momentum for some Democrats.

Rever North's Senate race in Virginia has created a deep party rift and attracted the most national attention. The number of North's GOP critics grew last week to include Gov. James Byrd, who asserted the former national security adviser had lied to her husband about the Iran-Contra affair and couldn't tell fact from fantasy.

The North dispute is less significant than the two mayoral desertions and others that reflect a split between GOP moderates and conservatives.

"What you have here are a bunch of Republicans who basically are saying 'we don't want any government,' and a major part of the Republican Party won't go that far," said Tony Coelho, senior adviser to the Democratic National Committee.

He said the officials who have jumped the fence or challenged GOP tenets foreshadow the problems the party will face reconciling its factions in the 1996 presidential campaign.

Haley Barbour, chairman of the Republican National Committee, attributed the two mayoral endorsements to local feuds, alliances and cash flows.

"Some officials want to have more state and federal money put into their city budgets," he said.

Barbour said Riordan and Giuliani were "out of step" with the energized GOP electorate but denied they were demonstrating any fundamental incompatibility with party philosophy.

He said they remain model Republican office-holders in terms of how they run their cities.

Giuliani is feuding with GOP Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, Republican gubernatorial candidate George Pataki's sponsor, and considers Pataki's huge income tax-cut proposal anathema to the city. He has called Cuomo a leader who understands urban problems.

Giuliani's endorsement seems to be fueling a Cuomo surge, and New York Republicans are seething.

"We've gotten threats about what my future will be," the mayor said Sunday.

received several calls from readers who said the paper's coverage of the Allred case was not news and that the reporters were LDS dissidents working for an anti-LDS newspaper.

Richards said this is being covered nationally, and he does a disservice to our readers if he doesn't cover it," Richards said.

Richards' case involved a conflict between a person's right to speak out and that person's obedience to LDS Church leaders, Richards said.

These elements create a mixture that confuses the media.

The Mormon Alliance issued press releases Oct. 10 and Oct. 27 about the case.

The releases specified details of the case and the disciplinary council and Allred's reactions to the actions.

Tosciano said the Mormon Alliance issued the press release on its own initiative.

"I think (the media) did a fair job (covering the Allred case)," Toscano said.

One challenge in media coverage of LDS Church disciplinary actions, however, is that Church leaders cannot talk about excommunication cases, so media coverage can seem one-sided, Toscano said.

"It is hard to give an objective, balanced report without having both sides, but you're at the mercy of Church policy," said Don LeFevre, director of LDS Church public affairs. "But there are always two sides."

LeFevre said the Church's policy to not comment on disciplinary hearings is for the protection of those involved.

"Local priesthood leaders are bound by policy to maintain the confidentiality of those cases, and the reason for that is to protect the individual," LeFevre said.

"If (those called in for disciplinary action) choose to go public, then the local priesthood leaders are still bound by policy not to comment," LeFevre said.

News organizations are given the task of finding balance in their coverage, and some Salt Lake City newspapers turn to BYU religion professors for a better balance of information.

During the past year and a half, media coverage has focused on the disciplinary hearings of at least seven other high-profile feminists and "intellectuals" in the LDS Church for apostasy and public criticism of Church leaders and doctrine.

Provo.

"People were disgusted and some decided they didn't want their music in the house anymore."

"One girl brought in her Nine Inch Nails posters, hat, T-shirts and CDs and said 'I want to get rid of it,'" Whitehead said.

Around 10 CDs have been returned to GrayWhale since the concert, a definite increase in sell-backs, Whitehead said.

Both Sonic Garden and GrayWhale buy and sell used CDs. While customers sell back used CDs of all types, it is rare to find big name bands, like Nine Inch Nails, being sold back, Xanthos said.

"You get the occasional big names, but not often and never concentrated like that," Xanthos said.

He said sales of Nine Inch Nails CDs have been much slower than normal at Sonic Garden stores in both

Salt Lake and Provo.

Whitehead said Nine Inch Nails returns have increased, but so have sales of the group's music.

Pegasus Music and Video, which does not sell used CDs, also reported an increase in sales of Nine Inch Nails.

"It's in our top 10. We've had a couple of returns but nothing unusual," said Shayne Eynon, a manager at Pegasus.

Crandall Audio has also had several returns, but owner Scott Crandall said they have sold "tons of Manson CDs" since then.

"People who buy music like that are probably not worried about the Book of Mormon getting torn up," Crandall said.

Sonic Garden has not had a single request for Marilyn Manson in either the Salt Lake or Provo stores, Xanthos said.

Although customers who return or refuse to buy CDs may think they are making a stand, a band publicist said it won't make any difference to the band.

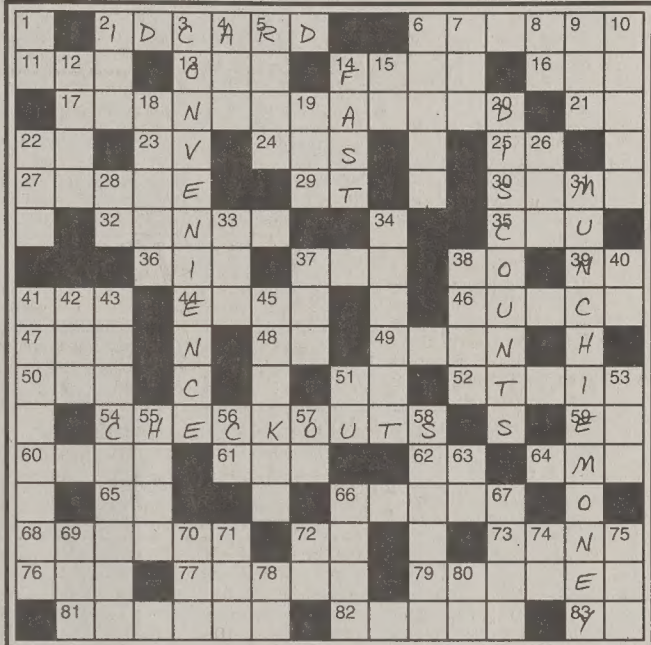

"It's funny," said Mark Knight, a publicist for Nine Inch Nails, when told about the rash of CD returns.

"Marilyn Manson and Nine Inch Nails do music for themselves, not for the money," Knight said.

"It's his call to tear up the Bible and throw it in the audience," Knight said, referring to the Book of Mormon. "He was really just questioning censorship."

He said bands only increase in popularity and make more money when things like this happen.

"Controversy sells records," Knight said.

Government forces attack Serbian supply road

Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Government forces that have handed Bosnian Serbs their worst defeats in two and a half years of war pushed ahead Monday with assaults on a supply route near Sarajevo and Serb-held towns in the northwest.

Serbs claimed to have blunted the offensives and promised hard fighting to regain lost territory.

Whether the Serbs have the troops, material and morale to rebound could determine whether the government's offensive will decisively change the course of the war.

Serbs said that the government attack on the Serb supply road, near Trnovo, was backed by an estimated 8,000 troops traveling to the front from besieged Sarajevo through a tunnel under the airport.

U.N. peacekeepers confirmed that government forces pushed back Serb troops in northwestern Bosnia. Bosnia's official radio reported that government troops took 12 square miles of territory, closing in on the towns of Bosanska Krupa and Bosanski Petrovac.

The Serbs are believed to be low on fuel for their equipment as a result of Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic's decision to seal the border in an effort to force them to accept an international peace plan.

"They are trying to get away because it's not a picnic any more," Bosnian Prime Minister Haris Silajdzic said. "It's not a rape, it's not a plunder, it's not taking gold from women, it's not easy. It's mainly a bullet in your forehead."

In the Bosnian Serb stronghold of Banja Luka about 50 miles east of the fighting around Bosanska Krupa, many ambulances were seen going to and from the Banja Luka hospital.

Bryan Graham, local spokesman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, said about 12,000 Serb civilians had fled the fighting and 9,000 alone were in the town of Bosanski Petrovac. Some were in corridors of overcrowded buildings.

Silajdzic said he hoped the battlefield victories would bring the Serbs to the negotiating table. A perception of coming victory may make the Bosnian government reconsider its acceptance of the peace plan.

"I am very satisfied with the response among the fighters, with their ever-increasing morale, and the exceptional support among the people," the Bosnian Serb news agency SRNA quoted Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic as saying.

"The international community, especially America, is tolerating the Muslim offensive, which is why we had to mobilize all our manpower, economic and other resources to defeat the Muslim forces as soon as possible," he said.

The radio, in a report confirmed by the United Nations, said rebel Serbs from neighboring Croatia joined forces with the Bosnian Serbs and launched artillery attacks on several government-held towns in northwestern Bosnia.

The United Nations reported a massing of armor and troops in Croatian Serb territory adjacent to the Bihac area.

The fiercest combat raged in northwestern Bosnia, where government forces continued a two-pronged offensive that has gained 100 square miles.

Government troops reached Kulen Vakuf, 21 miles south of Bihac. Other government units renewed an assault on the Serb-held town of Bosanska Krupa, which they surrounded Saturday.

Russia proposes mandatory AIDS test for foreigners

Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russian legislators, trying to safeguard their country from the threat of AIDS, want to test all foreigners for the virus and deport those who test positive or refuse testing.

The bill sailed through Russia's usually fractious 450-seat Duma, the lower chamber of parliament, with only three deputies opposed. It must still be approved by the upper chamber and by President Boris Yeltsin.

But the bill's strong Russia-first appeal, which reaches across deep political divides, makes passage likely.

Many Russians blame the West for the rise in prostitution, pornography and other social ills since the collapse of the Soviet Union. Some even accuse the CIA of creating the AIDS virus.

"This is clearly a discriminatory measure aimed at foreigners," Boris Mikhailov, a political scientist at the Russian Institute for USA and Canada, said Monday. "The nationalist tendency in the Duma is getting stronger every day."

Foreigners said the proposal endangers their rights, and warned that it could threaten tourism. Millions of foreign citizens, the majority from former Soviet republics, reside in Russia. Their numbers could make the law impossible to enforce.

The first case of AIDS in Russia was diagnosed in 1987. Until 1990, the disease was spread either by foreigners or as a result of poor medical practices, Dr. Vadim Pokrovsky, head of the Russian Center for the Prevention and Fight against AIDS, told the Kommersant newspaper last November.

Since then, however, AIDS has mostly been spread by homosexuals and drug addicts, he said.

The proposed measure, which the Duma passed Friday, would force foreign tourists, business travelers and other foreigners to prove they are not AIDS carriers. Foreigners who refuse to take the test or are found to be infected would be deported — although the bill does not address how such a sweeping plan would be enforced or funded.

The bill says that only Russian state medical institutions may conduct the AIDS tests.

Many foreigners might refuse to take the test because of widespread reports of poor hygienic conditions at Russian medical facilities, including reuse of needles. Some already bring their own hypodermic needles into the country for use in emergencies, although it is unclear if those would be allowed for AIDS tests.

A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy had no immediate comment on the measure.

The bill was quickly denounced by AIDS activists and human rights advocates in Russia.

Shona Schoningh, of the Russian outreach organization AIDS-Infoshare, said the measure would serve only to "perpetuate ignorance about AIDS in Russia."

Some in the Russian medical community welcomed the measure, however.

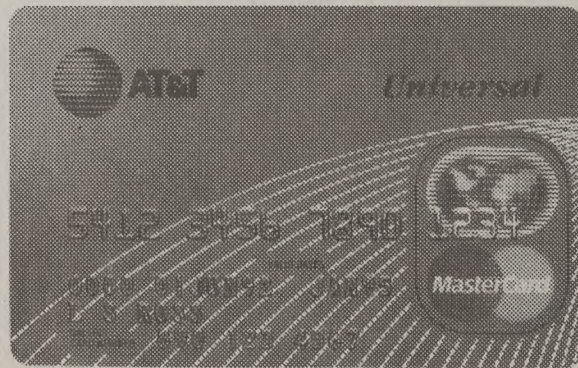

"It's not the most effective way to fight AIDS, but we have to start somewhere," said Galina Perfilyeva, dean of the nursing faculty at Moscow's Sechenov Medical Academy. "Russia needs to start taking responsibility for fighting this disease."
